as observed by him. It relates to the opening and shutting of the gates which communicate with the interior of the mound nests, which he found were opened and closed before and after every exit the ants make. These sates are simply little heaps of dry-leaves, twigs and other refuse, which are seen scattered here and there over the mound as one approaches it in when I first saw them I was com-letely deceived, and thought them othing more than accidental accumu-tions. I found, out, however, that uses piles were raised above the sur-ice opening of the galleries that pen-rated the mound and filled the ouths to the depth sometimes of an ob and s half.

This is a slow process, and apparently nothing is accomplished for a leng time. But evidently the whole mass of plugging is thus gradually loosened. Then comes the final burst, with roldiers, majors and minors in the lend, who rush out, bearing before them the rubbish, which flies here and there, and in a few moments is cleared sway from the gallery und spread around the margin of the gate.

These chips are doubtless gathered logether for this purpose, and are among the treasured properties of the anta, being kept near by for such service. I casily identified many pieces as being used several days in succession.

The doors remain open to give exit and entrance to the swarms of lear-gatherers until morning, when they are gradually closed, the process continuing in some cases until half past ten. In shutting up the house the minors appear to begin by dragging the scrattered refuse toward the hole. One by one they are taken in and the ingenuity shown in this is very great.
